

Now left-click the mouse, and the whole row will be selected. Now go to 'Table' and then 'Insert' in the menu bar and there click on either the 'Rows below' or 'Rows above' option, depending on where you would like to place the rows.

Similarly, for adding columns, you can take the cursor to the top of the column until it becomes an arrow pointing downwards. Now left-click the mouse to select the entire column. Then go to Table > Insert, and there click on either the 'Columns to the left' or 'Columns to the right' option, depending on where you want to place the columns.

Table Autoformat

Some tables may require splitting after you have arranged the data in the cells. For this, you can select the row from which you want to start the new table and click on Table > Split table to split the table accordingly.

2.3.4 Arranging Text In Columns

You can also arrange text in columns in a document. This is particularly useful when you would like to preview text as it may appear in newspaper.

You can either choose the text of the entire document or some part of it to be in columns. If you want the entire document to be in columns, then click on 'Format' on the toolbar menu and then click 'Column'. Choose a column style that you prefer, and then click 'OK'.

You can also specify specific column sizes and spacing between the columns using the 'Columns' dialog box.

If you want only a particular section of the document to be in
