

Google Desktop lets you search from Gmail, Outlook and other E-mail Clients logs and Web pages viewed via Internet explorer and Firefox can also be searched.

Upon installation, a small icon gets added to the system tray, from where you can access the application. You can configure the search window as a Deskbar or as a Floating bar. If you want GD2 to show full-fledged information about files, you might want to use it as a Sidebar. The Sidebar comes with small plugins such as News, Web Clips, Scratch Pad, Photos, Quick View, etc. News retrieves the latest news from the Google news network; the Photos plugin can be configured to show a slideshow of photos from your computer and online directories such as Flickr; and Scratch Pad is a simple memo pad with the autosave feature. Many other plug-ins can be downloaded from Google's Web site.

By default, the application searches for results on the Internet; you need to change the settings in the preferences page to get the app to search your computer. Similarly, the indexing data can be encrypted so that hackers or worm writers don't get access to your
