

Ah, Groups—finally, some sanity!

The Group option under the Layer menu is your saviour! Kneel and worship it for a few minutes if you have to, and then head on to Layer > New > Group. You will have to name the group, just as you do when you create a new layer, and then you will see a layer added to the Layer palette. Instead of a blank thumbnail, this new layer will have a folder icon with an arrow—this denotes a group of layers.

If you create a new layer while this layer group is selected, the new layer will be added under the group. You can also add layers to this group just by dragging them on to the group.

What you need to remember is to group your layers smartly, with, say, all text layers under a group called “text,” all images of apples under a group called “apples,” and so on. If you follow this practice, it will save you heaps of time later on when your image editing skills improve and you start working on complex images.
