

Google Groups

Start by creating groups from the homepage

Google Groups is a free service for communicating, discussing and sharing ideas through e-mail or at the Web site. You can create, manage, and browse groups to seek or give opinions, advice, resources, or information. Like several other group sites on the Web, it has all the basic features—search for topics of your interest, or browse for information posted on the groups.

Google Groups was Deja News before it was bought by Google in 2001. Deja News was popular for maintaining archives of Usenet newsgroups. The Usenet archives, containing a billion posts on content dating back to 1981, are accessible to members of Google Groups. On December 2, 2004, Google launched Groups Beta, with a new look and improvements over the earlier Groups. The new beta enables mailing lists and public discussions. You can bookmark topics that interest you and receive replies on starred topics on your group page.
