

two methods blog authors use to tackle this problem.

Provide partial feeds that show an introductory snippet about the post and force the users to visit the blog to read the full post. OR the blog author may decide to forgo the revenue potential through site visits and give them full feeds. Full feeds, as the name implies, contain the complete contents of the post.

In both cases advertising can be included in the RSS feed. Research has shown that full feeds are better as this will dramatically increase your subscriber base as compared to partial feeds. Many users just refuse to subscribe to blogs with partial feeds.

Additionally, it has been proven that advertising revenue from full feeds is much higher than from partial feeds. Primarily because users are more amenable to subscribing to full feeds than partial feeds. This in turn will result in higher ad impressions and hence increased ad revenue.

Three programs offer Feed Advertising:

Feedvertising:

<http://www.text-link-ads.com/feedvertising>

The screenshot shows the homepage of Text Link Ads. At the top, there's a navigation bar with 'Text' and 'Ads' separated by a circular arrow icon, and a link to 'Check out our FREE tools'. Below this is a menu with 'buy links', 'make money', 'about us', and 'contact us'. The main heading is 'FEEDVERTISING' with the tagline 'really simple RSS advertising'. A 'Member Login' link is on the right. The content area describes the service for bloggers, mentioning it's for WordPress 2.0+ users and that it's currently in a limited beta phase. A featured section for 'Techcrunch' shows a sample of a feed entry with a 'Techcrunch' link and a snippet of text. At the bottom, it says 'Advertisers Can Finally Get Their Ads on'.