Nexuiz is a 3D Deathmatch game project similar to Quake III Arena. It was first created by a team of developers called Alientrap, and is available on Linux, Windows, and Mac. It runs on the Darkplaces game engine—a modified version of the Quake 1 engine.

After downloading the game, you'll have to extract the contents in the .zip file and then simply click on the Nexuiz icon to start playing. There is no installation needed.

The game is all about the basics of gaming—gameplay, game-play and even more gameplay! It has nine weapons and 24 official maps, but an additional download of 35 maps gives the game more variety. Apart from the maps available on the Web site, several players on the forum have made custom maps and have put them up for download.

Our favourite weapon is the rocket launcher—don't you get that nice warm feeling when you blow an opponent to pieces using a BFG? Something really cool is that the game has a grappling hook, which players can use to pull themselves towards or up walls, allowing you to pull off some really cool moves or get to usually unapproachable areas.

The game is primarily multiplayer, but it offers a full-fledged single-player mode where the player goes through several maps while playing against bots.

We noticed that if you're playing against bots, they constantly try to kill each other, so grab a rocket launcher and stay close. As soon as one of the bots kills the other, finish him off—you can grab a few quick kills this way.
