

The Sites and Links button on the homepage takes you to a topic menu—a database of Web sites and Web pages that have subject matter related to topics in Psychology. The best part about this section is that each of the site links are followed by a good description of the site, its subject matter and what the site has to offer. The Journals button on the homepage takes you to a page that has a list of psychology related journals' Web sites / pages. All the journals mentioned in this page are arranged alphabetically. However, we did find a few broken links in this section.

The site also has a Today's Word link that has a word or term related to psychology and its definition. This word gets refreshed daily. You can also sign-up to have it sent to your email Inbox every day.

The most interesting part of the site by far has to be the Forums. This is a standard message board style forum that you can register for free. The forums are classified according to subject and under each subject we found several interesting threads started by psychology students with doubts, clarifications or just something new to share. The forums seem to be updated daily reflecting a good amount of student activity.

Get Psyched!—Free e-mail at Alley Dog

9.2.2 Higher Education Academy Psychology Network (www.psychology.heacademy.ac.uk)

The Higher Education Academy is a UK based learning centre that hosts this Web site. The Web site is fairly comprehensive in the information it holds about psychology and psychology-related sub-