

either dial-up, or VPN, or wireless. You can thus create profiles for each of your connection points and then switch between them from here. For example, say you use a dial-up network from home, a VPN from office, and you frequently find yourself in a coffee shop that uses a wireless connection. You can use this feature to switch between the three.

Connecting to a network

3. Set up a connection or network: While the above setting allows you to switch between different networks, this particular feature will allow you to create the connection points needed above. When you click here, Vista will present you with various options which you can use to connect to a network—whether for a workplace connection or for connecting to the Internet. Clicking on this entry will open up a Wizard which will offer these options:

Choosing a connection port

- a. Connect to the Internet, which will take you through the steps needed to set up a

Managing your connections