

application doesn't have it, you'll have to pester the developers to add it in.

Growl lets you customise how supported applications notify you—it can read out the messages or even e-mail them to you (not advisable unless you're away from your PC and really need to know what's happening on it), or even suppress them completely and just log them.

Forklift

Forklift is the Mac's answer to two-pane file managers like Midnight Commander, and then some. With just Finder, the simple task of dragging files from one folder to another (à la Windows Explorer) can be a

Forklift gives file management new dimensions pain, and Forklift's interface is welcome respite. In addition, Forklift is an FTP/SFTP client, and can even browse through mobile phones connected via Bluetooth.

Forklift features tabs, so you can have different combinations of folders open without the clutter. It also reads archives (ZIP, RAR, and more) as if they were folders. It's sad that you have to pay for it ($29.95, Rs 1,200), but if you find yourself limited by Finder (which you will sometimes), the investment's worth it.