

1.2.4 Marketing skills

We have a chapter dedicated to marketing your services, because that's how important it is. Make sure to get some tips from chapter 6 in this Fast Track.

1.2.5 What I can't do...

As we've mentioned earlier, understanding what you can't do is as important as knowing what you can. The most common mistake that's made when marketing one's services is to never say no. As a result, just to ensure business, agreeing to tasks, such as customising a CMS for a client's special needs, despite no one in your team having the skills to do so might actually land you in more trouble, and also earn you a bad reputation when you fail to deliver what you so eagerly promised when trying to get the client to sign on and commit money.

If you are thorough when identifying your strengths and weaknesses, you will have a clear picture of your limitations, and if you can't find people to plug those gaps, it's not a bad idea to find other entrepreneurs like yourself, who may be running their own service company, but have the requisite skills to do what you can't. This way, you might be able to negotiate between the client and the other company, and get at least a middle-man's cut of the profits.

In the next chapter we're going to look at some ideas of who your clients could be, and what kind of services you might be able to offer... 