

2.1 The Customer

Although every business or in fact, every human being alive who has used the Internet, is a potential client, aiming for a target as large as the globe is bound to lead to you misfiring and hitting absolutely nothing. This is where it becomes important to lay down some ground rules for who are your customers, and what are the ways you can identify their needs. This is what will help you when you approach them for business.

There are two basic types of customers that you will encounter – an individual or a business.

2.1.1 Individuals

Individuals usually want a simple domain name with a simple site, and maybe some email addresses, and they're usually the types to set up their own site as per their likes. The only thing that usually concerns individuals when they're buying is the costs. If you can undercut the market and offer solutions for cheap, they'll come to you, or else they'll usually go to the lowest priced vendor. Another problem with individuals is that they're usually harder to reach, in order to market your services to them. And you don't want to be spending big bucks to go up against popular registrars to get

Individuals are more likely to opt for exciting offers from one of the many registrars, because they search for what they want, when they want it
