

However, let's list out some ideas of services that you could offer to potential clients...

2.3 Identifying needs

Although you need to listen to your clients when they specify their needs, you also have to realise one very important thing – a lot of your clients might not know the benefits of having a web presence, or what your technology skills can help them accomplish; if they did, they'd already have such services in place... That's why it becomes increasingly important for you to think innovatively and come up with solutions that would help them with their business.

Let's take a look at some of the services you can provide, and what needs of your client it would take care of. Again, this is a short list of services, but you could do even more...

2.3.1 A domain

The most basic of all, this is perhaps the first step that will earn you a little money and also get your client onto the internet. One way in which you can value add is to search for appropriate domain names for your clients. So, for example, if there is a business called Singh Motor Training School, you can start searching for appropriate domain names for them, even before you approach them. If you do this smartly, you can get them hooked onto the idea of opting for your services.

Using the same example, you might want to suggest a .in domain name for this specific business, and since it's clearly a local business, instead of searching for singhmotortraining.com, or singhdrivingclasses.com, or basically trying to find a domain that isn't already taken, think local. If the business is located in, say, Colaba in Mumbai, you could try throwing in that into the mix when searching for domains. It increases the chance of the business being found by search engines, since people are more likely to search for areas rather than company names. So, colabadrivingclasses.in, drivingclassesmumbai.in, etc., would all be better alternatives for the company.

When you take this approach, and explain your reasons to prospective customers, they're more likely to treat you like a professional, and use your services. Plus, if you can, perhaps you can convince your customers to take on more than one domain name. For example, what if the Singh Motor Training School also has a car repair garage under the same roof... you could just let that one domain take care of all the services offered, or you could inform them of the beauty of separating the two services across two domains. Perhaps the same company could have three domains – one each for the parent company, the driving classes and the auto garage.
