

the company, or just helping them identify which hangouts contain their target audience.

You might also get more technical requests, such as integrating the client's CRM solution for them. This would actually be a major project in itself, but could earn you a lot of money, if you can convince your client that it's required.

Yet another service you could do for your clients is to start adding their company name and domain address into all the major search engines, and also start identifying the most used online classified services, and try and get your client's name listed there.

Whatever the clients' need, with a little bit of research and some skills, you should have no problem completing the job for them.

Keep an eye open for the last chapter that lists all the resources that might come in handy when you're working on some of these customised solutions. In the next chapter, we'll try and explain what platforms are available, and how you will be able to smartly choose one that fits your client's needs the best.
