

them as offerings to your clients whenever you want to – yet earning a decent profit.

Do your groundwork

In case, you're undecided yet, take your time and search deeper. Most of the time, being honest with your client will truly win their trust. You need to explain the thought that goes behind powering a web site. Your client may like a particular function in one web site, but the artwork and design in another. One web site may be superior in terms of functionality, while another in terms of its interface. By letting your client know of even more options to think about, they'd value you. Ask them to browse across web sites, especially those web sites they love and feel resembles the functionality they want in their web site.

Try emailing the web masters of these web sites or fill in the “Contact us” form. Most web sites do have one. Ask them about the platform they use, the server and hosting plans they use. More importantly, ask them the problems they face with their hosting provider, the down time, their customer support, etc. You'll suddenly have newer ways to ensure a satisfied customer – every business-person's dream. There are several ways to gauge, alter, combine and arrive at what your client prefers.

After deciding on your web server platform, you can safely strike out one question from the general hosting check list. However, assuming you've opted for either of the two platforms, the admin page of your hosting account is a vital feature that you can't afford to miss. It's a big marketplace out there. Everyone wants to flood you with the latest jargon that seems to contain all the inventions mankind ever considers the best thing after sliced bread. You'll hear terms such as Shell access, SSH, secure access, CGI support, Perl and scripting. What you need to look for, however, is a simple term called cPanel. This will make it easier to control the domains and web sites you will be hosting. cPanel is a widely used term in the web hosting business to indicate a usable admin panel. The term is a shortened variant of control panel. It is a panel that gives you the flexibility to control, administrate and even edit your content at the convenience of a single login.

Don't trust them?

One way you can overcome concerns you have about credibility, trust and the like is by verifying for yourself. There are several factors you must consider before deciding your choice of a reseller service. Although others may give you insightful opinions about each provider, but nonetheless, the decision is yours. And factors affecting your buying decision should be your convenience. Do not blindly opt for a service
