

Here's how you'd manage your web services business if you were to own a reseller account. Still need an office?

provider based on someone else's opinion. If a hosting provider is truly what it claims to be, it will certainly provide you with a demo account on request. Try out the demo account. Ask for a grace period before which you can give up the plan with a refund if possible. It is better to test the temperature before burning your fingers and dreading fire the rest of your life. Be wise and act beforehand. Test before committing! Once you have access to the demo admin panel, you will be able to test how effective the tools promised are. Try out the formatting of text and also insert images and other media. Check the speed and stability of the system. Your control panel needs to be simple to use, and should not be complicated in any way whatsoever. Check with multiple browsers to see if it is compatible.

During the period you are evaluating the hosting provider, try and ask friends spread across geographies to access the page, so that you can have an unbiased and tested way of ensuring that your guaranteed uptime is, in fact, delivered. Also make sure your friends do try accessing the page regularly so that you know that loading times are reasonable. Unless you are building the the world's most visited web site, we don't think you are in a position to neglect the part! Everyone wants things to happen fast after all. Web surfers in our age simply lack patience. And if you are to stay in this space and business, this is one area you can't afford to neglect.
