

such as that of Google manages to have outages. Therefore, as long as the services are not pathetic, up-times are generally up to the mark for most hosting providers.

Once you have bought the reseller account, you need to promote this service because Google is not going to miraculously find you and call people to inform them of your service. There are tricks of the trade that you need to apply to your business to make it a success. This starts with visibility. Unless your customers know you, how will they do business with you? Google hasn't started a service that gets you clients yet. Who knows, they might in the near future. They have this habit of doing the unthinkable. So we won't be surprised! Till then, you'll have to do the hard work of, working hard. Promote your web site on forums where the decision makers get together. Web master forums, web hosting forums and forums catering to web frameworks and platforms will be the best place to start.

Also, after having bought the reseller account and also got a heavy discount for the amount of space you now own, it just makes sense to use all that saved money into some critical PPC plans. Launch an ad campaign. We knew we wouldn't be too far with something Google. Let AdWords come to your rescue. Even PPC plans from Yahoo! and Bing would be worth exploring. This works by ensuring that people who search for a particular term such as "cheap web hosting services", for example, get your newly launched service showing up in the returned search results. This way, they are aware and it is popularly believed that Google rules the web. If you're not on Google, no one will really bother about you. This holds true, but not entirely. The deciding factor, however, is that what else can you do? If not Google, what else? It turns out, finally, that the smartest way to promote yourself online is follow the largest and most influential force. Today, that happens to be Google.

In effect, a PPC plan will cost you because depending on the keywords you select for your service, you will have to pay a variable amount for each click you receive on the search result. Again, although you would be paying for each click that you receive, those clicks need not necessarily translate to business for you. This could be disheartening, as expectations and emotions do run high, especially after investments have been made in to the service. You need to be reasonable and give it some time. If you notice people coming to your web site and noticing that
