

4.3 What to look for in reseller accounts

As we discussed earlier, reseller accounts should not have limits on them. Services should be free to use in anyway possible and sold to as many possible. Similar to conventional hosting plans, with reseller accounts, you should try and get a feel of the admin panel and also find out about the up-time guaranteed by them. You should try contacting customers they claim to have. Everyone likes to boast about their services.

You don't ask an Intel dealer whether Intel is the best processor for you. That's where Agent 001 comes in. If you're new to Digit, then look out for a guying donning a yellow cap guy offering advice in the magazine and you'll know who Agent 001 is!

When it comes to reseller accounts, you need to be careful before arriving on your choice because you could end up paying more in the long term, thereby eating up into your profits. Some factors you should compare are as follows:

4.3.1 Price

It's money that rules every business. As a reseller, you are out there to run a business. While you may be passionate about your work and are excited about it, in the long run you would be calculating the profit you expect to receive. You certainly don't want to ensure a loss in your business. Therefore, one decision to buy a reseller account affects you in the long term because you could end up buying more as your business grows. In fact, as your client base increases, you would be requiring domains as well as other services such as designing if you are not good at designing yourself.

In case you have to hire a designer to prepare the artwork for you, that just robs you of some handsome profit. On the other hand, if there were ready made tools that let you customise or build the web site for you, then you could still run your business probably all by yourself without ever depending on additional resources. At the end of the end, you'd have all the money by yourself. Even functions that are additional and for free such as scripting support, one-click CMS install add to the savings in the long term.

4.3.2 Services and products that allow you to make money

Your business is of no use if your customers can't transact with you. Your customers need to be able to make transactions by way of a shopping cart because that is the eventual goal of every business. Assistance for shopping carts and secure gateways are the basic requirements for a web business. If you are able to provide these services, then you will
