

Introduction

We've written Fast Tracks and articles before on how you can make money using an internet connection... so what makes this one different? For one, our previous attempts of helping you earn money were predicated on the assumption that you had mad technical skills that were so much in demand that someone would be willing to pay money for them. Coding is one typical example here, and the hundreds of freelancing sites out there offer you a chance to try and earn some money using said skills.

However, not all of you can code, and not all of you may want to. So what do you do if you are a geek, who has technology knowledge and a business mind, and wants to earn some money – working part-time or full?

That's where this Fast Track comes in... we assume that the people reading this do know enough about technology to understand everything that's written here, and whether you can code or not is irrelevant. The more technology knowledge you have the better, obviously, but in no way does it mean you can't make money after reading this book if you are even an absolute beginner.

What you will read in the following pages is ways in which you can make money by selling services, or more appropriately, re-selling some services which more and more small businesses need these days, and do a pretty good job at satisfying your customer. Not only are we going to cover some technical aspects of the business, we're also going to give you some socialising and networking tips to help you identify your clients, and teach you how to fulfil their needs, and thus, get repeat business.

Anyway, enough chit chat, let's get down to making some money...
