

on subcategories, or pricing, and sort them based on price rating and popularity. Unfortunately there seems to be no way to browse apps by a developer or publisher.

You can of course search the Windows Store as well, and process is the same as searching any other app. You can use the charms bar and click / tap search.

Each app has its own page which includes screen shots, a description, licence terms and other such information. Each app will also list the permissions it has, such as whether an app uses location services, or uses the internet, whether it has access to your files etc. Also included are reviews for each app, and one good thing about the review system used by the Windows Store is that it shows whether the person leaving the review used a trial version or the full version of the app.

For paid applications, you can either buy the title outright, or try it first. Microsoft allows app developers to pick a right trial period, so you could have apps giving trials for 1 day, 7 days, 15 days, 30 days, or even perpetual trials. Now, you need to be careful with trials for Windows 8 apps, once you try an app, and the trial elapses, there is no way to try it again. In fact if you have multiple user accounts, no other user on the same computer can ever try that app again.

On the other hand, there is some good news when it comes to purchased software. With multiple users on a computer and multiple computers to a user, you might be wondering how applications are licensed. Microsoft has kept this simple. An application you purchase on your computer can be installed for all user accounts of that computer. So if Sumeet and Palak are using a computer with separate user accounts, and Sumeet purchases an application, it can be installed on Palak's account as well. Likewise if Palak purchases an app it will be available to Sumeet as well. Additionally, all the apps you purchase can be installed on 5 separate devices. So Sumeet can install software he purchased on his personal tablet as well, but the applications available to Sumeet because he shared a computer with Palak will not be available to him on his tablet.

These can't be installed from here
