

Viber

Viber works in the same way as WhatsApp but has one additional important feature — free voice calling. So instead of paying for talk-time by the minute, you can make calls over the internet to other Viber users and talk for as long as you'd like (especially when you're on Wi-Fi). Viber's second trump card— other than supporting all the popular smartphone OSes — is its supports of the not-so-popular ones such as Samsung Bada as well. And since its functionality is similar to WhatsApp, phonebook contacts are automatically added to favorites if they're using the app.

Twitterrific 5

Although the freely available official Twitter client may be satisfying for many, if you're in need of better, this is a terrific app for iOS. The clean design and use of great fonts is a treat for the eyes. You can start reading the timeline where you left off on another device by putting a bookmark. It has gestures for performing frequent actions faster. It also supports offline posting, favoriting and following people. It automatically changes to the dark theme at night and color-codes tweets in a unified timeline. For Android users, give Carbon a spin while Windows Phone users can try Rowi.
