Mobile devices are no longer just tools to communicate with. They've turned into our virtual jesters, keeping us jolly wherever we are

Apps have widely changed the way we consume media. Instead of the dictatorial approach that we've been used to (like programmed TV channels or broadcast radio), today we have the freedom to choose what we want, when we want it. Not just that; apps also help us instantaneously figure out what song was being played on radio or at a club. They help us recollect the name of a forgotten movie on the basis of the actor who played a part in it. Then there's convenient automation of rudimentary tasks like pulling out lyrics to a song as it's being played.

Smartphones and tablets are also coming in handy to musicians; whether it's something as simple as tuning their guitars or as their digital paraphernalia in live gigs. If that wasn't enough, thanks to the internet, no FM radio station's reception in the world is out of range for you. As you can see, so many standalone devices have been rendered useless thanks to our mobile devices doubling up to do the job with the help of these apps. They've rendered physical media useless, so there's no need to go to the local video library to pick up a DVD. If your net connection is fast enough, streaming a movie in HD quality happens as soon as you press play.
