Bitcoin can remain rigid and possibly become a niche currency for dubious purposes in the future.

currency like exchanges and online payments for games. If an online gaming portal could find a way of integrating Bitcoin protocol payment systems, Bitcoin could find a dedicated community of users who understand its technological aspects and know how to use it effectively.

The very likely outcome we are sure to see in the future is financial companies, banks and governments to study and adopt the Bitcoin protocol for its socially beneficial features. Credit card companies could easily establish a version of the Bitcoin protocol where users of all banks and holders of any credit cards could instantly and immediately make payments to each other without incurring transaction costs.

Credit cards and banks could also adopt the Bitcoin protocol internally and provide the hybrid advantages of fast, efficient and free transactions with the security of knowing that your money is safe from sudden loss. This adaptive attitude by financial companies could thereby usurp the current popularity of the Bitcoin system. It is obvious that Bitcoin isn't made for all types of economies, specially developing economies like India where an internet connection is a rarity and trust of technology is predominantly low. In such places the positive adaptation of the Bitcoin protocol could prove revolutionary specially if its mobile applications are verified. The socially positive possibilities are endless if innovated responsibly.

Bitcoin is just the beginning

The history of the internet and money was not planned or well executed, with too many private players taking advantage of the new medium to
