

lack of time. But because e-learning is available on demand, the average working professional has the flexibility of choosing when and where to catch up with his or her class. Got a meeting that's making you travel this week? Don't fret because you can catch up with your classes when you get back.

An organization is only as good as its human capital. This means that not only does every organization ideally hire the brightest mind they can find, they also need to keep these employees on top of all the latest advancements in technology, practices and what not.

From an organization's point of view, the one major benefit that e-learning has to offer that also serves as the deal-maker is the fact that the costs involved in training their employees are really low. Let's say for example an auto manufacturer has just included a minor alteration to the engine of one of its cars. Now it's necessary that every single mechanic in their service network knows that:

Hardly working or working hard?