rewards, badges and points, the entire e-learning system is being incentivised this retaining more users. Seeing how this formula seems to be working quite well, it wouldn't be surprising to see more of this in the near future.

This brings us to what else we can see happening to e-learning in the near future. For one thing, online videos are going to get more popular than ever. Seeing the success e-learning groups like Khan Academy seem to be having with their videos, it's plain to see that videos are an interesting way forward for e-learning if not at least as a supplement to it.

The next thing you can expect is more MOOCs or Massive Open Online Courses offered not only by e-learning companies but legitimate universities too. While Ivy-league universities like Harvard and MIT already offer MOOCs which see over 36000 students signing up, in the near future one wouldn't be surprised to find even more universities offering courses online.

But one sad thing you might expect to see is the monetisation of these MOOCs. Let's face it, instead of offering a MOOC to 36000 students, most
