

Jobs and Woz working on the Apple I.

The two Steves were introduced to each other by a mutual friend. While Wozniak was an engineer and single-handedly designed the 'Apple I' (and the 'Apple II'), Jobs was more of a manager. He took their first offering to a local computer shop, The Byte Shop and managed to convince the manager into buying their computer. With a purchase order for 50 machines at $500 a piece, Jobs went straight to local electronics distributor, Cramer Electronics and placed his order.

"How are you going to pay for this?" asked the manager at Cramer Electronics.

"You see this?" asked Jobs, waving the purchase order signed by Paul Terrel, the manager at The Byte Shop. "This is a purchase order for 50 machines, payable on delivery. I'll pay you when I get paid and believe me, I'm getting paid."

With the parts ready, Jobs, Wozniak and a friend called Ronald Wayne began production. The Apple I quickly earned Wozniak a good reputation. Even though it was a rather mediocre product, the Apple I used fewer parts and was a design masterpiece.

While Wayne and Wozniak assembled the machines, Jobs managed to ensure that the parts kept coming in.