

The world's largest Pac-Man

Like the name suggests, the world's largest Pac-Man games stands at a whopping 9-feet tall and comes with a 108-inch LED screen.

The arcade video game has been made by Bandai Namco, who also happen to be designers of the original Pac-Man arcade video game back in 1980. This particular massive set up allows two players to play simultaneously to complete the icon mazes of the original game. Even the high scores are now set up to show competing scores, showing which player earned more points during the game.

Also, it's got the good old coin slot – insert coin to continue!

There's also a feature to upload and feature your own image on a the screen in what's called an "attract" mode. Which basically just confirms Bandai Namco put their game on a billboard. Actually, they've said it themselves.

On the gaming company's website, you can find the following about this particular set: "Have you ever wanted to play your favorite game on a video billboard? Well here is your chance to play the classics like you never have before. Bandai Namco and Raw Thrills will light up your room with the World's Largest Pac-Man."

If you've got a room and budget big enough for this massive Pac-Man game, you can get one for yourself for $11,000.

Fitt360

On the surface, the Fitt360 looks like one of those clunky wireless earbuds. Only, instead of earbuds, you've got cameras on the end of the band. Fitt360 comes from a company called Linkflow and it's their first product. They're still funding the Fitt360 on Kickstarter actually, and if you haven't already guessed what it does, it records everything around you.

Since you wear the camera around your neck, footage it records looks like watching videos in the first person, you would be able to see the wearers arms swinging about like it were your own (it would actually be your own if you were the one wearing it). You can watch footage on a connected smartphone via an app. Through the app, you can also share the footage on your platform of choice. Linkflow have said that they're planning on a live-streaming function in the future.

According to Linkflow, the main use for the Fitt360 is when you're out touring or on a hike, basically moments when you'd want to have a camera handy to take photos. That would make life easier, and probably safer in some cases. The Fitt360 has blinking LEDs to indicate whether it's recording or not, and they've made sure to ensure that the LEDs are clearly visible so that you know if it's currently recording or not.

iPhone X Bentley Edition

There are already a few customised iPhone X options out there in the market but we're sure this particular one would definitely catch anyone's eye. The iPhone X Bentley Edition is a limited edition version of the iPhone X with only 100 handsets being made by Golden Ace, customisers based in Geneva.

The Bentley Edition features an all black back with 18K golden motifs/trim. The place where you would normally find the Apple logo has been replaced with a beautiful golden Bentley Insignia. In terms of looks, definitely one of the better looking customisations out there in our opinion. It doesn't get classier than this. Unfortunately, it doesn't look like there's a lot of information out about this particular edition. At least not while we were writing this. So we don't know about the price or availability of this particular edition. If you actually have pockets deep enough to afford one of these, you might have to keep a sharp eye out, because most of those 100 pieces are all probably already booked for all you know.
