BOOKS THAT SHOULD BE MADE INTO TV SHOWS

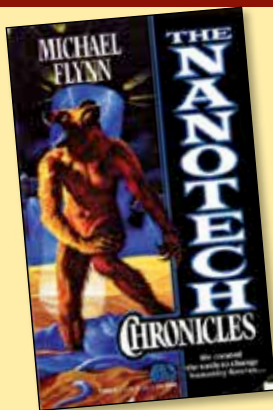

We have been seeing some stunning TV shows based on fantasy and science fiction books, but there is a lot of untapped potential out there. Here we list some of our favorite science fiction and fantasy works that could translate very well into TV shows.

THE ETERNAL CHAMPION

The series follows the adventures of the many incarnations of a single hero across a rich multiverse. These worlds feature fantastic elements, victorian era cyberpunk, advanced technology from the far future, and improbable mixtures of these elements. A show based on The Eternal Champion sequence by Michael Moorcock would require a big budget, but promises to be visually breathtaking.

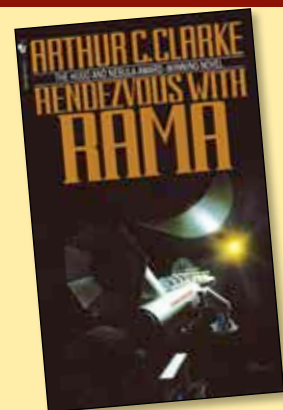

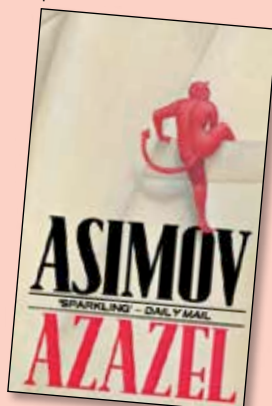

THE NANOTECH CHRONICLES

This is a hard science fiction book, with pretty realistic technologies, and featuring long discussions between researchers and engineers over the ethical implications of their developments, as well as how to meet project requirements. This can be an anthology series that explores the issue through different stories. The book follows the invention of nanotechnologies, as well as the effect it has on the human race.

AZAZEL

One of the funniest creations by Isaac Asimov is Azazel. The two centimeter high wish granting demon and/or extraterrestrial is used by his friend, George to help people out of various tight situations. Azazel cannot use his powers in a way that directly benefits George. Hilarity ensues when the wish fulfillment does not go exactly the way George imagines it, and is usually counterproductive.

RAMA SERIES

The Rama Series by Arthur C. Clarke and Gentry Lee is an epic story spanning 6 books, with the reveals getting bigger and grander as the story progresses. It all starts with humanity investigating a mysterious cylinder sent towards the Earth by extraterrestrials with advanced technologies. Over the duration of the series, viewers will be treated to humans establishing a colony on an interstellar alien ship.
