For a change, Boo-Man loves selfies just don't get it. Why do people hate selfies? Sure, it's a complicated process, and usually results in fugly looking close-ups of noses, but then again, most of us look just as fugly from another foot or two away, which is the more traditional picture. The advantage selfies have is that you don't need anyone else to help you take a picture. True, you don't need people anymore at all, because cameras have timers and there's this invention called the tripod that no one ever buys, resulting in middle-aged uncles asking me to take a picture of their family of 42! Plus, I don't have to make 97836458 brute force attempts to capture the picosecond that the whole family sits still, keeps their eyes open, looks at the camera and actually smile like members of the homo sapiens species!

Another reason selfies are awesome is that they fill up my social media newsfeed, because obviously we need a break from all the doom and gloom that is called news today. Used to be a time where there needed to be an event, or a holiday, or a birthday, or some reason to click pictures, but with the selfie generation, every moment is one that should be captured. And shared. It has to be shared. How else will people know how deeply you drink from the clear waters of the pool of Narcissus? Just woke up? Selfie time! Same for when you are about to sleep, before you eat, after you eat, and more. At least the loos used to be off limits before, but now I can marvel at the Italian tiles in your father's bathroom thanks to loofies! The only thing missing? Smellavision tech, so that we can truly be in the moment with you!

Another great thing about selfies is knowing what you'd look like if you were crossed with a duck. Yes, the selfie is surely the greatest invention of the millennials, because it's an exercise in gene transplantation. It's also a way to show off how long your tongue is, and also remind people that you don't own a tongue cleaner, as you stick it out as far as it goes, pretending (I hope!) to lick one another, or lick other disgusting things. It's also an experimentation in camera angles, and boy do I love it when you click those upside-down selfies in mirrors so that I can join you in not knowing up from down!

We love mimicking the west here in India, and I can't wait for the latest trends to catch on. We already have the gym selfies, the changing room selfies, no make-up selfies, too much make up selfies and the filters that make you look like a plastic doll from a horror movie selfies. I can't wait for funeral selfies to catch on... you know, because your "friends" are really going to love your selfie with a dead family member.

We can also look forward to just got divorced selfies, after fornication selfies (because no one is interested in posing before), crying selfies, and various states of undress selfies.

Whether or not those catch on in India, there's one trend that's already started. Dangerous selfies are one of my favourites! It's like nature finding a new way of cleaning up the gene pool, without me having to become a mass murderer! In the rush to be unique to get some likes on a social media site where no one really cares about you, some young folk are pushing the boundaries of selfies. Because we have all of the dangers of every other country (and more), and none of the policing and safety measures, youngsters are finding it easier and easier to push the limits here in India. While in most developed countries you can never get close to a moving train without someone shooing you away or fining you, in India, not getting run over is just one more thing the living have mastered. It's no wonder that more people have died in India taking selfies than in any other country in the world.

Whether it's playing chicken with a moving train, or no... I'm going to refrain from giving our younger readers any more ideas... let's just say that things which can kill you are not something you should look away from in order to click a selfie. Also, when you're the person in control of a moving vehicle, please do not touch your phone, because you don't want that last ever picture you took to be a blurry duckface. Or maybe you do... What do I know, I'm just an old guy, right? If you want to be an old guy (or gal) someday, stick to loofies, and ignore the dangerous selfie trend. Please. 🐼
