ACCOMMODATION BOOKING

When you're thinking of booking a hotel room, there are two things you need to consider. The first is the cost and the second is the proximity to the tourist spots you intend to visit. Naturally, there are numerous options to look at when you're looking for hotel accommodation. Trivago does a great job of aggregating the prices of several hotels. The list is always extensive and you might just find one in your budget all the time. However, you should also know that as the price goes down, so do the facilities. So, either you'll have to compromise on the price or some facilities. If you're going on an international trip, you could try out Airbnb. You will surely get lower prices than luxury hotels while still enjoying the basic facilities.

Sometimes, you might have to share your room with one or more people. However, that's completely up to you and you can choose whether you want a shared accommodation or single. It's always smart to book your hotel room in advance, maybe a month or two before. You'll end up saving a considerable amount of money.

DISCOVER TOURIST SPOTS

You're done with booking your travel tickets and hotel accommodation. What next? It's time to sit down and plan out the locations and tourist spots that you want to visit. Either you can spend an entire day or two reading through travel blogs and picking the spots. Or you could simply download Google Trips. It's a really useful tool that curates all the things you can do in that particular city. Right from the top-rated spots to special heritage locations and religious sites. The app lists down everything along with ratings, timings and reviews. All this data comes from Google Maps, so essentially, it's more like a crowd-funded recommendation app. You can save your favourite locations so that you don't need to find them again. It also lists down all the available transport options whether it's by public transport, ferries or taxis. The required data can be downloaded and used from the phone offline, in case you're going somewhere with poor data connectivity. When your flight tickets arrive in your Gmail inbox, it's automatically pulled into the app. After you're done picking your favourite spots, it's time to create a scheduled plan.

PLAN YOUR VISITS

Things are falling into place now. You have decided all the places you want to visit. To ensure that you don't make plans on the fly, it's essential to create a daily schedule. Of course, you can use your calendar for the same if you want to keep things simple. If you wish to step up your game and form a sort of timeline to view and remember how your trip is going to turn out, you should check out Triplt. The app allows you to plan your travel in a chronological order that can be viewed as a timeline. Right from the time you board the flight or train, until the time you return, you can list down everything in this timeline. You can save the trip containing all the details of the places you ate and visited. It will definitely work out in your favour if you're taking another trip to the same city or recommending stuff to someone else.

TRAVEL EXPENSE TRACKING

It isn't that difficult to lose track of the money you're spending on your trip. You might have a fixed budget for the entire trip but that doesn't mean you will be able to optimise the amount you'll be spending. If you're among the ones who fix a budget for your trips, then you should definitely sit down and plan how much you are willing to spend every day. For example, you could distribute your daily expenditure based on your planned activities such as museum tours or daily meals. At the end of the trip, you'll be thanking yourself for having saved money rather than having to splurge extra
