

Life size Tyrion Lannister

A 3D printing enthusiast has designed and printed a life size Tyrion Lannister, and made the design available for free. <https://digit.in/sep18-63-1>

Architecture in pop culture

Angie's List has created set of pen-and-ink drawings featuring memorable settings from pop culture. <https://digit.in/sep18-63-2> be KnowYourMeme and EncyclopediaDramatica. The former collates the description, origin, spread and known variations on the endless sea of memes available out there.

Just in case you're looking for something more serious, you're not in for disappointment. There are actual universities out there offering real courses on memes. For instance, University of California, Santa Barbara offers Linguistics 135 - Memes: When Language and Culture Go Viral as a course which "introduces theories and methods needed to understand how and why memes work, including memetics, intertextuality, dialogicality, resonance, branding, stance, voice, identity, network effects, linguistic ideology, and culture." As a part of this course, students also get to conduct web-based research on memes, virality and more.

To take things one step further, if you're going for a post graduation in communication, media, the internet, a PhD in memes is not entirely unheard of. Take Kate Milner from London School of Economics, who's channeling a love for Lolcats into her Masters dissertation. Along with her there are a number of students and researchers taking up memes as the subject of their PhD dissertations. Lets see you get that approved from your professor.

A MEME LIBRARIAN

Before we delve deep into the kind of jobs that your meme knowledge can easily get you, there's one particular individual you should know about. Officially, Amanda Brennan is the senior content insights manager at Tumblr. However, she is mostly referred to as the meme librarian.

Yes, you read that right. Her job description? Tracking every meme that shows up on Tumblr, which is one of the most popular memeing and fandoming platforms for millennials. Prior to working for Tumblr, she was with Know Your Meme where she got the job title of 'meme librarian'. As a result, she is almost always in tune with what's happening on the internet and is often called upon talk shows to share her views and knowledge about internet memes. Her passion for information and memes have landed her in a place where she can mix her love for memes and her day job while making a good buck.

Meet Amanda Brennan, meme librarian

MEME-TREPRENEURSHIP

Have you noticed the number of meme-only pages and accounts in most popular social media platforms? These accounts, with followings in the millions, have mostly been started by individuals as a hobby or a pastime but have evolved into considerable sources of income. Popular indian accounts like Rajnikanth vs CID Jokes, Insta_desi not only boast of a large following, but also promotional campaigns from brands running on their accounts. Some of them even manage to earn in the lakhs per month.

The story of meme entrepreneurship actually has another aspect. Georgia Tech student Anushk Mittal was like most of us during his first year of college - looking at memes as a quick source of entertainment and humor. Pretty soon, he realised that the current platforms where memes are shared aren't optimised for meme content. He set out to solve that problem by creating the app Memeois. Fast forward to 2018 and the platform boasts of more than 80,000+ active users on with over 12M recorded meme interactions on Android and iOS, along with alternative platforms like iMessage and even an Augmented Reality app where you can put memes in the world around you. With a database of 1M+ memes indexed intelligently (and increasing every second) Memeois is gathering significant insights about memes while you're reading this. If you were to assume that this is passing fad and there's no real opportunities in there, Memeois is in the process of completing a seed round of funding that would put their valuation at $2.7M - and they're hiring.

"We're a fun technology startup first and foremost, so the basic requirements are that you should LOVE memes," says Anushk, Founder and CEO of Memeois, "A typical day of work gets me to interact with 10,000+ memes. At Memeois, we love to have such people as in-house experts to help select featured memes (think about app store editors but for memes), pick the ones that are really good for sharing across social media and to understand the community and state of the memes. After this, we look for really smart people, who are best in what they do"

According to him, this is just the beginning for meme experts. With marketing using memes already showing results almost 10x better than standard marketing content, meme experts are all set to become an integral part of a brand's strategies across social media, advertising, content writing and more. The question is, are you ready to leverage your knowledge of the dankest memes and make a living out of it?

Memeois is like Giphy but for memes only