

Pop culture as archaeology

Artist's work reimagines pop culture items, along with everyday use items today as relics in the future. <https://digit.in/sep18-64-1>

Watchmen TV Series

HBO has confirmed a TV adaptation of the acclaimed DC Comics work from Alan Moore and artist Dave Gibbons. <https://digit.in/sep18-64-2>

Boo me!

Boo Man tells us why he hates himself...

Boo-Man | boo@digit.in

A

few months ago a reader wrote to me asking me if I could really criticise everything. As a challenge they asked me to boo CES, and Digit, which you would have read in the Inbox section. As a way to up that challenge to "epic proportions" for the WTF issue, I've been challenged to boo myself. In the minds of the simpletons who are unfortunately my colleagues, this is an impossible task for someone who they think of as a narcissist. They obviously don't know a thing about me! Anyone with half a brain knows that nitpickers are generally miserable people who are dead inside and hate themselves the most of all.

Without further ado, let's get started with the easiest column I've ever had to write! (I'm actually timing myself to see how long this takes).

Although I am an anonymous writer for Digit, I have been part of this team for several years now. So how did I end up with Ed insisting I write a column every month? I guess it all started when some of my friends visited me in office, and were telling my colleagues why they nicknamed me "Buzz Kill". Fresh out of college, a bunch of us went to see the movie Avatar, which was also the first ever 3D movie any of us had seen. While the theatre was resounding with the sounds of oohs and aahs because of the novel 3D experience, and a few were probably engrossed in the rather pathetic storyline, there I was, sitting aghast, almost wanting to go demand my money back! On the way out of the theatre, I stopped two of my friends who were waxing eloquent about the experience, and said, "Really? You liked the movie?". "Of course! What's not to like?", they made the mistake of asking...

"Well. Let's see. Humans are capable of interstellar travel, but still only have ballistic weapons? Even when they do attack the Na'vi, they don't just go up to the mothership and wipe them out from space? Mechanised power armour has a big glass front, right where the human is, and the glass is so weak that wooden arrows can pierce it? The Na'vi and all of the life forms are so similar to Earth's fauna? Na'vi look like aliens that are a cross between felines and bovines, but have human butts and, err... chests? Should I go on?"

Buzz Kill: I hated Avatar!

And that's how I got my nickname. Needless to say, it's in my character to spot flaws in everything, and once pointed out by my friends, it kind of bubbled to the surface at work too. Much teasing ensued, and eventually rather than fight it, I embraced it. This led to Robert suggesting that when we did the redesign, I should dedicate a page a month to venting usefully, and here we are.

With the sad story of my origins out of the way, let's look at why it sucks to be me.

Imagine never being able to sit back and enjoy anything. From food to movies, from gadgets to software, being finely tuned to finding flaws in everything is a curse. If you're a man, imagine watching TV, or YouTube, and every single pretty lady you see on there, you automatically picture with no makeup, morning breath, tousled hair, with warts on her face, and with a paunch. That's my life, except with tech and geek culture. The example was only to get you to empathise with my predicament, because I still love women, and haven't ruined that experience yet, thankfully.

Of course, it doesn't help when men and women don't like you because they think you're a negative Nancy... And that's another thing... Just never being able to get along with anyone because your nickname is either Buzz Kill or Boo Man. In fact, I'm the only person I know who dogs growl at, and cats hiss at! When the animals know there's something wrong, it can get quite depressing.

Now, add to this situation the fact that I make a living off of being this way, and you have the perfect dilemma. Do I eat but be miserable, or do I develop a better attitude and friends but be unemployed? What would you do? 