GIFTED?

Somewhere in the distant future... or maybe in the distant past.

IT HAD BEEN A COUPLE OF WEEKS since rationing was enforced in the capital. After the IPAC treaty broke down, things weren't as chaotic as many naysayers had declared. It was just really difficult to get your hands on the essential stuff. "Or hand," thought Jhaquel, staring at the raindrops glistening off the stainless surface of his bionic right arm. The war felt distant, like something that had happened in another lifetime. That wouldn't really be possible anymore - with consciousness being mass uploaded to the Collectorate's reservoirs for eternal mining. Jhaquel plunged his biological arm into the satchel slung across his chest and retrieved a rag that had seen better days in its own time. The worn out sigil of the Ceres Defence Forces, or CDeF, as the emblem proclaimed, seemed to be mocking him as if sensing a residue of the same planetary patriotism that he would vehemently deny and detest, should anyone ask. The same emotions that charged him when he rushed his T1/9 into the battle in the skies over Phobos, paying little heed to either the superior armoury or the established repute of Martian military prowess. The same emotions that cost him his right arm.

When the war was over, he had precious little to go on, having spent most of his resources into getting his life back on Ceres. It's true that history is written by the victors, but that doesn't mean that the vanquished simply disappear beneath the clouds of war. One of the crucial terms in the IPAC treaty was the unconditional surrender of CDeF personnel and with that came the abandonment that had left Jhaquel to fend for his himself, armless, without a roof over his head on a planet that was a bountiful home mere months ago.

Things changed when he met Delta. She encouraged him to give up trying to be a mercenary - it wasn't doing him much good either, with the single arm and whatnot. She found him a day job where his disability was inconsequential. After a few years working his legs off as an exoskeleton tester, she also helped him save up enough to get his own bionic arm.

It wasn't state of the art. In fact, The ARCTuro Limb 2.0 was far from it. But to Jhaquel, it was the most prized possession he had ever owned - even more than the T1/9 from his war-mongering days. He would wake up early every morning, take it off the charging dock and polish it for exactly 20 minutes on the clock before putting it on, testing all the joints and sensors before a round with the punching bag. It had given him a new lease on life and at the same time, taught him to appreciate everything around him. More than anything else, it had taught him how to love, and that love was reserved for no one else but Delta.

Which is what made giving it up all the more difficult.

The sign above the rusted door fizzled in and out of life. Waterproof power has been available for decades, but this isn't the kind of place that would waste Sols on that. Jhaquel wiped the moisture off his bionic arm one last time before passing through the entrance, sliding the door back shut behind him. Heavily rusted wheels groaned along with the grooves of the doorway before shutting out the sound of the
