designed for sport and fitness enthusiasts. However, they're quite bulky, and so is the case. This added bulk allows them to boast of a near 5-hour battery life in our tests and a total battery life of close to 14 hours with the case. While we could ask for better water-proofing than the IPX4 rating, the SoundSport free offers a rugged build to compensate. The buttons are placed on the top of each earbud, instead of the side, making it a bit difficult to get used to, or use on the go. These earbuds let a lot of ambient noise in, which is not always desirable.

Performance: The sound quality is where the SoundSport Free shines through. With a laid back, slightly warm sound signature, the openness of the earbuds' design works in its favour allowing a more lively, natural presentation. Don't expect chest thumping bass, rather, look out for the slightest squeaks and breaths that you might miss on other, more-bass heavy devices. Details on dense tracks such as Pull Me Under from Dream Theater are evident, and Hunter by Bjork loses none of its eccentricity or positioning. While most people consider true wireless earbuds to be a novelty at the moment, the SoundSport Free could make the case for this category based on sheer audio quality.

Verdict: The Bose SoundSport Free has its distinct pros and cons. You risk looking like a futuristic android with its massive bulbs protruding from your ears. The bulky case would also mostly require a pocket dedicated to it, but will also console you with the great battery life. When it comes to the sound quality, you are likely to forgive its shortcomings in all other areas. If not for the build issues and its specific targeting at sports enthusiasts, Bose could have made a strong case for winning this test.

RHA TRUECONNECT

Build and design: RHA has gone the matte-black way with its first foray into truly wireless earbuds. In terms of design, this one's the closest to the AirPods among everything on the list. However, that isn't necessarily a bad thing. With a soft-touch rubber coating on everything, including the case, the TrueConnect is warm to the touch. The case is also small and elegant and swivels back to reveal the well-nested buds. A pair of buttons, one on either bud, controls the playback and the volume respectively. The angled nozzles differentiate it from the AirPods and allow a good fit, improving isolation. The stem aids in removal. While the individual battery life is standard at about 4.5 hours, the case provides an additional four charge cycles, pushing the total beyond 20 hours. This, combined with the IPX5 rating, makes a strong case for the TrueConnect.

Performance: Popular is what RHA goes for with the sound of the
