RHA TrueConnect

Matte black true-wireless goodness

It seems like almost no discussion around the genre of true wireless headphones can commence or complete without discussing the Apple AirPods. However, this particular review is concerned with a direct competitor from RHA, The TrueConnect.

Design and Build

Sporting an overall matte finish, the U shaped case features a hinge design which slides up to reveal the housing for the earbuds. The case is built of metal and the matte finish varies on the hinge and the housing, with RHA using a soft touch rubber coating to increase the smoothness. The fact that it's a slider shouldn't make you worry as the mechanism snaps shut when closed and does not open accidentally. USB-C charging on the back of the case means that these also top-off faster.

The buds themselves are plastic but sport the same matte finish, adding to the premium feel but keeping themselves lightweight. However, the same finish makes them, and the case, prone to retaining a lot of fingerprints. The stem that juts out of the earpods is definitely comparable to the Airpod design and does aid in the removal of the buds. While this design might be hated by a bunch of people, it allows companies to put functional bits outside the ear and allows them to make smaller buds.

The included ear tips do a fabulous job at passive isolation, even more so if you use the foam tips available. They stay firmly in place during heavy workouts as well. That, combined with the IPX5 rating and the isolation, makes these surprisingly good at being gym companions. The angled nozzles push the audio deep.

Controls

The controls are where we spot the RHA TrueConnect's first fumble. While play-pause is rather intuitive with a single tap on either earbud, music control is on the left earbud whereas volume control is on the right. The rest of the controls can be confusing or downright interrupting for most. A touch interface would have been way better.

Battery

In terms of battery capacity, the TrueConnect is quite phenomenal. We managed to get about 4.3 hours out of a single charge and the case change top that up four additional times, making the total capacity cross 20 hours. On top of that, the fast charge feature actually does work its claim of topping up 50% of that charge in 15 minutes.

Performance

The sound of the RHA TrueConnect is far from neutral. However, that isn't always a bad thing and such is the case with these true wireless earbuds. The bass is quite pronounced and fun, without being painful to listen to. The comply tips make the isolation even better and push the experience further. Listening to Uptown Funk by Mark Ronson, the rolling bass chorus loop in the background is always present, but doesn't get overshadowed by the powerful beats. Bruno's voice in the same song also plays well with the rest of the music, without being suppressed. Songs like Hunter by Bjork sound detailed, with the soundstage being handled well, if not as good as some counterparts.

On the other hand, the TrueConnect's weakness shows through in the highs. It is still better than a number of alternatives we've tried recently, it still does get bested by some better competitors when it comes to highs. Playing Centuries by Fall Out Boy at high volume led to a significantly distorted experience. Tracks like Pull Me Under by Dream Theater sound a bit messy as if someone is trying to make the headphones try too hard.

Verdict

The RHA TrueConnect is a really good pair of true wireless earphones. They're built well, they charge quickly and last long. Due to the presence of an IPX5 rating, they also qualify to be good gym companions. The presence of Bluetooth 5.0 also added to the overall audio performance on offer. Keep in mind there's no ambient awareness mode and no dedicated app, but RHA does all it can to make you forget all about that, and we tend to agree. If the price puts you off, we would recommend the Plantronics BackBeat FIT 3100 as a cheaper alternative. On the other hand, the Jabra Elite Active 65t is more feature-laden and often sells for cheaper. However, if you want a no-nonsense workout pair of true wireless earbuds that does what it claims and does it well, the RHA TrueConnect is a great option.
