FEEDBACK FOR THE MAY 2019 ISSUE OF DIGIT

Send your feedback at editor@digit.in

Hi editor

I've come to complain against the frugal importance given to anime. You guys barley have any content related to it, or maybe I didn't find it. For hard-core anime lovers such as myself and a few friends of mine, it's sad to see that this isn't given as much importance as we thought it would get.

If an otaku logs in to your website and types in anime, they should probably expect lot of articles regarding the same, including some theories about some anime, or a poll on who's the most loved character of an anime, or even a review. To be honest, that's the type of content that would make people like us want to participate in discussing the article, because we have a lot of info about that particular topic.

Some people are really insecure about discussing anime or putting it out into the open because (saying this from personal experience) they call it "lame" or a "Chinese pirated cartoon." It really makes one person mad who really loves their fandom and all they want is to find someone to discuss and fangirl/boy with.

It's honestly really lame and tiring trying to explain how good a particular anime (or even a manga!) is and how it would be fun to watch (the anime) or read (the manga) it. Some people in your friend circle might just not get it you know? Saying this, I hope you consider all of this and maybe try to add more articles. Five or six more won't do any harm right?

Hey Kashika,

It's great to see how passionate you are about anime. It's true, we don't have a lot of stuff on anime, it's kind of a niche. Very few of us here at the labs actually watch any anime at all. I've been trying to get these guys to watch a few myself.

I get what you mean about people being insecure about discussing anime, it's usually not a hobby most openly discuss. Calling it a Chinese pirated cartoon was a new one though, that gave all of us a good chuckle.

To change things for the better, we're going to be making anime reviews a regular thing starting from our upcoming June anniversary issue. Hopefully, you'll discover some new ones or perhaps you could tell us the ones that you're most interested in and we'll be certain to check it out.

I know your time is valuable, I'll keep this as short as possible.

1. I was able to contact Nayan only because of you great guys, so thank you for that. We will be starting the project I told you about, after his exams (just thought I should let you know).

2. Every company is absolute bi-*t*h towards privacy (sorry if the language is offensive) except Apple, gotta give Apple props for that. Google is a creep, it's saving some of my data, like the recorded conversation with Google Assistant to a server thousand fun miles away without my permission. I still haven't checked if they fixed it yet... The only way I think about it is this: If you're using something for free, you're not the customer, you're the product.

A lot of people will be switching to the Apple ecosystem during this period so an article on bringing all your data to this ecosystem will be great. And as we all know, user is the weakest link in any security system so a privacy guide for users will be helpful. A little comparison between password manager apps will be useful.

3. I think I have some ideas that can make this chaotic world a little bit better place. Last time y'all told me to check out Digit forum and most of the discussions are about choosing the hardware for you next PC build, it does not have discussions related to game development or ideas for next startup or astronomy stuff (I love SpaceX). I need to find a place where I can freely talk to some real geeks who share their ideas and dreams with me. If you know such a place, like a Reddit forum or a Facebook page, please let me know.

It just hurts me....it's painful, the world is so connected, the geeks, resourceful guys and the potential game changers exist, and I cannot find them.

Anyway, I really appreciate your support. Just keep doing what you're doing. Buh bye

Hey Archit,

We've been telling people for ages that they're both products and wal-
