

18 RABBIT HOLES ON THE INTERNET TO DIVE INTO

01

ATLAS OBSCURA

This website lists the strangest and most interesting locations around the world, including odd buildings, abandoned complexes and natural wonders. There are 143 locations catalogued in India itself, so this site can contribute significantly to your bucket list. One of the sections is Gastro Obscura, which is meant for the foodies who really like to experiment.

02

DARWIN AWARDS

These awards are given away to people who have removed themselves from the gene pool through stupid ways. The site is a treasure trove of crazy ways in which people have died, and is one of those sites where the comments section is actually good. There is also an urban legends section, which are not verified stories, but the accounts are hilarious and well written, nonetheless.

EARTHCAM

Earthcam has a network of cameras that show realtime video feeds. There are a bunch of city skylines, underwater webcams and 360 degree cameras on the network. The most entertaining cameras are the ones placed in zoo enclosures, which lets you gaze at a wide variety of creatures. The particularly engaging ones are of baby animals.

NAT GEO MAPS

The National Geographic magazine gives away a large map in every issue, and these are now available online. The subsite also has infographics that are total time sinks, which provide a ton of information at the same time. By combining technology and innovations in cartography, these maps lets you see the world from fresh perspectives and in new light.

05

ORIONSARM

Orionsarm is a community science fiction world building effort set in the far future. The scale of the undertaking is colossal, and there are interstellar empires, alien species that could possibly exist, and futuristic technologies that are still grounded in hard science.

POSTSECRET

Postsecret is a site that invites people to send in anonymous home made postcards containing a secret. The project has been going on since 2005, and unfortunately, there is no archive of past secrets. This is a website that you have to visit every week to keep up with the latest secrets. However, the community art initiative has resulted in a number of books, that you can purchase.

POUET

If you have ever pirated software in the 90s (not something we ever encouraged), you would have seen the keygens and cracks accompanied by electro music and technofuturistic animations. These are known as “demos”, and Pouet is the hub for all artists in the demoscene. The demos have just gotten better over the years. You can view productions by platforms, and there are demos for the Raspberry Pi, Playstation, Amiga and Windows.

REUTERS THE WIDER IMAGE

Reuters has a wide network of Photojournalists, and is one of the biggest image resource for news organisations around the world. Normally, these pictures do not directly reach the audiences, but The Wider Image by Reuters is an effort to do just that. There are a number of categories for browsing what are just about the highest quality slideshows around, our favorites are “Living Planet” and “Interactive”.
