

Frank Muller Encrypto

Swiss watchmaker Frank Muller has released a new watch dubbed Encrypto. What makes the watch special is that it is the world's first functional Bitcoin watch. Yes, that's right. You can actually store and secure your bitcoin within this watch. And also check your balance through the watch.

The watch was created in collaboration with Regal Assets, a cryptocurrency trading platform. Only 500 such watches will be made. In terms of aesthetics, the watch features a bitcoin logo in the centre of the face, and a QR code below the logo. This QR code represents the bitcoin's genesis block address. Each watch comes as a two-part "Deep Cold Storage" set. This is the dial, which has its own unique public address etched on it, and a separate sealed USB that contains a private key. The deep cold storage wallet uses "offline generated, non-deterministic TRNGs (True Random Numbers Generated) and Regal Assets claim that the watch cannot be hacked.

The Frank Muller Encrypto is available for purchase online and in Dubai at the brand's store. You can buy the watch using a number of payment methods, and naturally, one of those methods is with Bitcoin. The range isn't cheap though, with a starting price at $9800 and going all the way up to a whopping $50,600 for the diamond encrusted version. If you weren't into Bitcoin, Frank Muller is also apparently looking into watches of the Ether and XRP versions. He hopes to cover the top five coins basically. If you can afford one of these watches, you probably made bank when crypto prices went up.

Caviar Game of Thrones edition Samsung Galaxy Fold

Game of Thrones may have finally breathed its last this summer, however, that doesn't mean the craze around the massive phenomenon has to die with it. We may not have been particularly happy about the way the show ended, but luxury phone maker Caviar's Game of Thrones-themed Samsung Galaxy Fold is a gorgeous technology piece that any Game of Thrones fan would kill for, regardless of how much the final season may have sucked.

Caviar has made a name for itself over the years with its array of custom phones which are made using some of the most expensive stuff you can find on the planet. While the Samsung Galaxy Fold isn't even out yet, Caviar have gone ahead and revealed this snazzy gold version of the Fold and boy, does it look b-e-a-utiful!

The custom Samsung Galaxy Fold specially focuses on George R.R. Martin's next book in the series, 'The Winds of Winter'. The gold plating on the panels is adorned with intricate designs that refer to the story of the famous "A Song of Ice and Fire". The gold frame has depictions of a dragon, a wolf, and a lion, we're sure you know what they refer to. The back also has a map of Westeros engraved into it. So, if you're missing the visually-stirring intro to the Game of Thrones TV series sported, just flip your gorgeous Game of Thrones edition Samsung Galaxy Fold around.

Caviar have said that they'll only be making seven of these custom phones, one for each of the seven houses bearing unique designs. Only seven! That means we're probably not going to get one of these. Not because we don't have the money, because we definitely do (DON'T).

The fact that there are only seven of these just makes these devices even more desirable, and the fact that the Fold is a pretty amazing device in itself. Sales of these phones will begin when the Samsung Galaxy Fold is officially out (which is soon, hopefully), and if you want to get your hands on one (if it isn't already pre-booked by a million people already), it'll set you back by a whopping $8200.