

New Disney Plus shows

Disney announced three new shows for their streaming service - She-Hulk, Ms Marvel and Moon Knight. <https://dgit.in/sep19-33>

New PS5 renders

The supposed patented design of the dev kit of the new PS5 was found and renders were created. <https://dgit.in/sep19-34>

You again?

Like a stalker, retro is back, and Boo man is livid!

Boo-Man | boo@digit.in

“A

h $&^*#@!!” Was my reaction when the Editor informed us about the cover story this month. While it was really funny to watch his eyebrows shoot up towards his bald head at the expletive I used, that’s not why I said it. It’s hard enough trying to be creative and find faults with brand spanking new stuff that everyone else is fawning over like a Mills & Boon lover, but when it’s stuff that I’ve already moaned about in the past in life, it’s just boring!

Besides, if I complained about stuff when it was new, and then 20 or 30 years later I complain about it when it makes a comeback... is my repeat complaining also a part of the retro fad? It’s stuff like this that keeps me awake at night. That, and the neighbour’s pet cats, who are in heat right now, and sound just like an old record being played at the wrong speed.

Speaking of records, why on earth are they even making a comeback? We’d forgotten about these horrible things for a reason. They sound like fingernails on a chalkboard (because they work on the same principle anyway), are overpriced, bigger than my dinner plates, and hold hardly any songs on them. Yet you will find “connoisseurs” who will wax eloquent about all things vinyl, clutching desperately to something niche in order to feel special, as you will for just about any pointless niche. Don’t get me wrong, I’m not against everything vintage or nostalgic, and I totally understand the value that antiques have. If you’re spending a small fortune on a gramophone from the 20s, with all original parts and original vinyls from the era as collector’s items... that I understand. However, a brand spanking new piano black vinyl player with a diamond needle and some state of the art drive that spins records with more precision than NASA dare hope for when completing space docking maneuvers, which costs thousands of Trump’s dollars, and is being used to play vinyls of Bieber’s greatest hits, or some trance/techno rubbish that sounds like a rat orgy gone wrong... well, that just leaves me scratching my head in bewilderment!

Almost all of the vintage trends, especially in technology, have me wondering what we’re coming to. Are we so devoid of new ideas and innovation that all we can do is rinse and repeat, and pour new wine into old bottles? Making new, and cheap, Chinese-mass-produced gadgets look like something out of our past, in order to tug on our heartstrings, so that we loosen our pursestrings and try and buy the happiness we had as kids?

I still play some old games from the early 90s, and reminisce myself, but I do it on a PC or a phone with an emulator. I wouldn’t spend good money buying what’s basically a cheap version of the Raspberry Pi, inside a plastic shell that’s made to look like an old console, just to have 10 minute flashbacks of simpler times every three weeks or so! If that’s what you want to do with your money, more power to you, but I’ll refrain from this lazy avenue companies are exploiting to make a buck.

Now fashion, that I can get behind. We geeks love playing dress-up, and at all ages. Whether it’s donning a costume for comic con, or putting on vintage era clothes for a themed party, it’s all fun, and clothes that are retro are actually used by us after we purchase them. At least it’s not a waste. And if nothing else, you can apply to be an extra on the next Sci-Fi franchise that involves time travel, or a period drama. Fashion is fine, because it has you partake in the experience, and usually as a group.

The lazy remakes of old classics, often with so little creative input and updation that it’s like watching a rerun. Take the 2019 Lion King movie, for example. That was the best power nap I’ve had in a while! Why on earth would you take an animated movie, spend a small fortune on re-making it with modern and realistic sfx and graphics, and then change almost nothing in the storyline? It’s the easy way out to claim that the original was so perfect that you didn’t want to change it. If it was so perfect, why remake it to begin with?

This is the trend I detest the most. The boring creative wall we seem to have hit, where rehashing old stories and movies seems to be the only way to keep audiences enthralled. Are our lives now really so boring that we have to go back in time to remember something noteworthy and fun? I certainly hope not! 