WHAT'S NEW

HBO continues to surpass Netflix at the Emmy's 2019

At the 71st Primetime Emmy Awards on September 23, HBO continued to maintain its supremacy over competitor Netflix with a staggering 34 wins, which is the highest number of awards won amongst all the participating cable networks. This really should come as no surprise since HBO has the powerhouse fantasy drama, Game of Thrones, in its corner. GoT alone secured 32 nominations, with HBO boasting a record total of 137 nominations at the beginning of the star-studded night.

Netflix did manage to exert its prowess by securing an impressive 27 wins at this year's Emmy's while Amazon walked away with a respectable 15 wins. HBO's trump card, for the past couple of years now, Game of Thrones emerged victorious from the Emmy's with awards for "Outstanding Drama Series" and "Supporting Actor in a Drama Series". Chernobyl, another HBO show received the "Outstanding Limited Series" award.

Arkham Origins studio teases something special...

On the eve of Batman Day, on September 21, the creators of Batman: Arkham Origins, WB Games Montreal released a teaser video, which seemingly implies the release of a new Batman game. This is the first time the studio has tweeted since the year 2015! The teaser video features three glitchy frames which are probably deliberate and ardent fans of the caped crusader have joined forces to try and decode what they are referencing.

As per speculation, one symbol seems to point out to Court of Owls, an organised crime group in the DC Universe and the other seems to have something to do with Ra's al Ghul. Coincidentally (or not?), one year ago, a WB Montreal developer tweeted a shirt logo that very much resembles one of the glitchy flashes, with an owl embedded on it. This tease seems too deliberate and fans are hoping to see a brand new Batman game after the moderate success of WB's Arkham Origins.
