Chandrayaan 2

Why Chandrayaan 2 was a disaster!

AIT! Before rushing off to rage about this article, I suggest you read it first. When given the impossible task of finding negatives in something I am so proud of myself, I found myself procrastinating like crazy. Eventually, I think I've come up with a list that most people should agree with. Or so I hope!

- Chandrayaan 2 (CY2 from here on), exposed the disgusting side of some people. Top most amongst those was Pakistan's science minister, who immediately took to Twitter (where else...) to say something stupid. Despite being almost perfect, CY2 was unable to silence the trolls.

- CY2 also made it impossible for us as Indians to hate everyday Pakistanis, because of the replies from them, telling their own minister to shut up! If we can't hate on Pakistanis anymore, India vs Pakistan cricket matches are not going to be as fun now :-(
- CY2 reminded us that space exploration is HARD! Despite ISRO being one of the most successful agencies in terms of success vs failure ratios globally, we were reminded that even ISRO-made space vehicles aren't completely infallible. Even if the lander was only 5% of the mission, and did still successfully crash into the moon, it was a rude awakening to people who were taking our success for granted.

- You bought a car? How can you when you still have a home loan to pay off?
- If there's one thing that you're guaranteed to get with space exploration, it's the conspiracy theorists and alien aficionados jumping up and down screaming "Aliens!" every time something unexpected happens. Thus, something like the Vikram lander veering off course and losing the communication link, brings out

- CY2 also failed to shut up the regular bunch whatabouters. I'm fed up of seeing the, "Why spend money on space when we have <insert problem here> still!" argument. These people drive me up the wall! Every country has problems, and if we waited for one problem to get fixed 100% first before trying to solve another, we'd get nothing done. Ever. Just apply that same logic to people, and it becomes clearer:
- Why are you buying a phone? Don't you know there are beggar kids on your street?
- How can you buy a house? Don't you know you're under/overweight?

all the standard theories about Aliens jamming signals, hiding in the shadows, and also claims that the US and China already have bases on the moon and shot it down...

- Finally, and perhaps most importantly, everyone spent so much time mourning the lander, they seem to have forgotten that CY2 is a 7-year mission for the orbiter, and was a mere 14 day mission for the lander. We hope the same amount of enthusiasm for CY2 will continue for the next 7 years as ISRO releases information about what the orbiter uncovers. I know Digit will continue to cover it regularly for years, I just hope all of you will be reading about it and celebrating the success of CY2 with every story we put out.

Is there anything else surrounding the CY2 event that you are disappointed with and want to boo? Write in and tell me.
