I

should start this article off by telling you something shocking about some random person running some random company you've never heard of, preferably female because that grabs more attention now. It needs to be either supremely positive or voyeuristically negative. Ms X, we'll call her, should either have retired at 27 with enough dollars to sit on a beach in Hawaii sipping kale mojitos for the rest of her life, or I should go into great detail about how at just 27, she was already burnt out and had already suffered a stress-caused heart attack. It has to be something shocking enough for you to sit up and take notice, but it has to be anecdotal to make it real and relatable. Why? Because in this day and age of 3-second attention spans, you, dear reader, are considered to be more see so many articles online with the intros and buzzwords I'm talking about is because that's what is being clicked on, so you really only have yourself to blame for the cacophony.

If we were to equate modern article writing to producing porn, then you can draw some parallels. With porn, at first, even drawing shapes of naked bodies and sharing them felt voyeuristic and ingenious. Those would be comparable to the very first magazines that started doing the rounds in the 1700s with content that wasn't just simple news reporting. Eventually, thanks to technology, porn moved on to still images, and we moved to regular magazines in colour, where the written word had to work less, as beautiful visuals picked up the slack. Then came video, and boy do we love our videos! However, when you get inundated with so much, the Feed-y, basically), and us coming up with some weird word for it, and the irritating habit of slapping "porn" on the end of it to arrive at a buzzword. Zen porn, gadget porn, property porn, food porn, pod porn, not porn, etc., are all examples of "porns", but this article will look at the ones that matter to us tech lovers. Remember to send me your thoughts about these buzzwords and practices.

HUSTLE

"Hustle Porn" is a term that is attributed to Alexis Ohanian, co-founder of Reddit, the world's biggest online discussion forum. The term "hustle" itself comes earlier, from the entrepreneurs who popularised it. Whether it was Steve Jobs agonising for months over tiny details of a product and making people work overtime to perfect it, or SpaceX and Tesla CEO Elon Musk working long

I will do no such thing. Which means fewer people will read this article when it's online, and I will have broken rules of SEO and also general modern writing guides. So be it.

GRAB YOU BY THE *****

Let your imagination insert whatever part of your anatomy you choose, behind those asterisks. One way to grab you is to come up with nice buzzwords. Whether it's a creative journalist or an entrepreneur who comes up with the buzzword, all of us in the tech industry adopt it in a flash because buzzwords result in search traffic. The reason you mind starts to shut out the cacophony of sameness that's shrieking at you everywhere you go, and it becomes far harder to, err, grab your . Most of us who have lived through the online porn revolution don't even notice the naked ads on some of the more dubious sites we visit (torrent sites or illegal free streaming video sites, especially). We're also immune to articles like this one, because there are thousands like it online, many worse, and many better, perhaps. You, dear reader, are merely a small percentage of people who saw this headline, and then read the article. Thank you for that.

What I'm getting at is our love for everything shocking (everything Buzz-hours and expecting the same from his employees as well, it's all "Hustle Porn". Ohanian was criticising the fetishization of working long hours with no breaks that's rampant in the tech industry, especially in the US and India. This always-working state is called hustling, and people who do it hustlers, etc. Many of the "inspirational videos" that are shared on social media give off the message that if you're not struggling, and not working non-stop, you're not achieving anything and not pushing the boundaries, this is called Hustle Porn.

To be fair, Ohanian has a few very valid points. If you think the only way to succeed is to work all day and night, get no rest and devote your life to your
