

Google search gets better

Google announced that they are altering their search app and it will now understand the context of the search. <https://dgit.in/nov19-79>

Quantum supremacy?

Google claims its quantum PC can perform a calculation that would be impossible on a normal one. <https://dgit.in/nov19-80>

Letter of the Month

August, 2009. One of my first visits to the school library. I was apparently too young to go to the magazines section, but I remember sneaking out one of those “grown-up mags” from the shelf. I hadn’t even looked at the cover until I sat in my seat and glanced upon it. It wasn’t love at first sight though. In fact, I was regretting not picking up a story book. I didn’t have the slightest idea that the name I read so ruefully, would actually become an inseparable part of my life.

“Digit”. Still, I opened the book. I started flipping pages. Mobile phones! Laptops! Games! I couldn’t stop my hands now, my eyes twinkling like a puppy who found his owner. My brain exploding. My legs shaking. Heck, I hadn’t even started reading the text yet! And the bell rang. We were going back to class. I left the mag there on the table, and just like any other ten-year-old, forgot all about it.

A couple of months later, I visited my regular bookstore, for my monthly dose of Chacha Chaudhary and Tinkle. And to my surprise, I saw that grown-up mag on the shelves. I picked up the issue, looked at the price, and put it back. It was either digit or three comics, and my choice was clear.

But then I would see it there every month, and with time, my curiosity grew. I had to buy it. I had to look at those pages again. Get that same adrenaline rush I got the first time. And finally, one fine day, I bought it. And another the next month, and another the month after that. And another every month after. I was addicted to Digit. My curiosity had turned into love. The love for technology and everything that came with it. I remember my dad scolding me for spending too much on the mag. So I told him to get me a subscription which was much cheaper. I still can’t believe he said yes! I remember I almost shrieked when I received my first “Subscriber’s Copy”.

Since then, I religiously renewed my subscription every year. I got accustomed to receiving the mag every month (though always a little late), reading it in a couple of days, and then waiting impatiently for the next month to arrive. Slowly, this became a part of my life, and I became a regular Digit reader without realising it.

July, 2018. I am leaving for college. A lot of preparation is still left, but my dad asks me the most important question, “What to do with your remaining subscription this year?” And since only a couple of issues were left, I told him to receive them here at home and stop it from the next year. I still loved Digit. I still wanted the postman standing at the gate, waiting for me to sign and receive my copy. But I was moving on.

October, 2019. I am now a second year, B.Tech CSE student at IITK. I visit my home for my midsem break. I find my mom cleaning out some old magazine shelves. And I see it. My Digit collection. My memories. My history. My past. All of it coming back. I feel nostalgia hitting hard. I feel that excitement I felt the first time I picked up that grown-up mag.

And then I realised, it wasn’t a mag for grown-ups after all. It was really for the kid within. For the ten-year-old, whose eyes twinkled when he looked at it, who was curious enough to abandon his comics and buy it, who would read entire issues in two days, and who sincerely loved it with all his heart.

I took one of the mags from my shelf. And I stared at the cover. “Digit”.

I flipped through the pages. Looking at the photos, looking at all that I had already read. I took out another issue, and flipped through it. And another. And another.

Every issue, still the same after all. Nothing had changed. Neither the mag, nor my love. Unfortunately, I discovered I was still ten years old...

—Shashwat Gupta

You Win:
Mystery Gift
& our hearts!

FEEDBACK FROM THE TELEGRAM GROUP: t.me/digitgeek

Could you include a Fast Track/article for python for network automation? This month’s FT was what I was looking for.

—Ashish Sharma

I enjoyed the article about Batman’s transition through the years and how that iconic character has been shaped through time. Also the article about dart was really helpful.

— Eishan Deshwal

It was great. I liked the SKOAR! and Boo man sections. Bat man was great. I have a question: where can I watch anime? Fast Track was OK, poster was fantastic. I cannot really express how much I liked this issue in a telegram chat. Keep it up.

— Nishanta

MYSTERY GIFT – TELEGRAM

I loved the science section this month! The title story on Hustle Porn was amazing; great stuff by Boo. Shout-out to Aditya Madanapalle, really loved his piece on Social Smashups. I’m actually a physics student who really loves programming and found this piece fascinating. Great issue!

— S

Send us feedback via email, telegram, discord, or social media, and win mystery gifts!