This Google Earth image is rather confounding. It is essentially an island-in-a-lake-on-an-island-in-a-lake-on-an-island! Try and make sense of that. A tiny island sits inside a crater lake on Volcano Island in Lake Taal on Luzon, a Philippine island.

An individual named Pedro Martin Ureta created this guitar made out of trees as a tribute to his wife who passed away at the tender age of 25. It is located near the General Levalle in Argentina. Interestingly, Ureta is afraid of flying, so he's only seen his creation in pictures.

Creating a strange medley of colours, these are ponds where potassium chloride evaporation occurs to form the interesting colouration. They are located at the Intrepid Potash mine close to Moab, Utah.

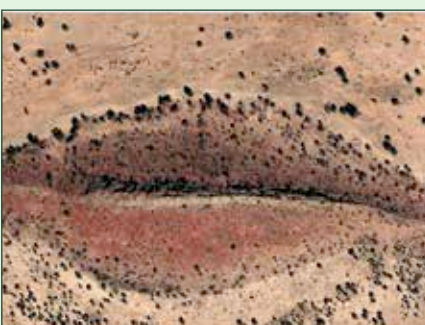

This rough representation of the world was built somewhere off the coast of Dubai. However, it hasn't turned into a luxury retreat as the developers hoped and only a few of the 300 islands are currently occupied.

This is the 'blood-red lake' located close to Sadr City in Iraq. There's no official explanation for the lake's baffling colour. However, theories state that the slaughterhouses in Iraq dump blood into canals causing the weird colour.

A billionaire Sheikh and member of Abu Dhabi's ruling family, Hamad bin Hamdan al Nahyan, had his name carved into the surface of the sandy al Futaisi Island, which he actually owns. The carving is a half a mile in height and 2 miles in width.

Resembling plump human lips, this is a strange hill formation in Darfur, Sudan. It is one kilometre long and stands out since it seems to be formed from a different coloured sand than the surrounding area.

To celebrate Coca-Cola's 100th anniversary, a Coca-Cola bottler turned 70,000 empty Coca-Cola bottles into a giant Coca-Cola logo near the city of Arica, Chile.
