Horizon Zero Dawn is coming to PC

Is exclusivity no longer honoured?

he next generation of gaming is almost upon us, with Microsoft and Sony's next consoles primed for release later this year. In order to sell their respective consoles, they're backed by promises of features like backwards compatibility, 4K 60fps gaming and of course, exclusives.

While Microsoft decided to do away with exclusives entirely, it wouldn't be wrong to assume that exclusive games have been the driving force for PlayStation sales. Sony's biggest advantage over its competition, and one of the main reasons it has been winning the console wars for the past three years, is its vast catalogue of exclusive titles. Titles that are good enough to warrant buying an entire console for it. The quality and quantity of exclusives that Sony offered on the PlayStation easily made it the better choice of the two, especially since the introduction of Microsoft's Xbox Play Anywhere. With Play Anywhere, you didn't really need an Xbox anymore, as all Xbox exclusives were now available on PC as well. Of course, there were plenty of other issues with the Xbox One as well which caused people to avoid it entirely, but that's not the crux of this rant.

This rant comes hot on the heels of the news that Horizon Zero Dawn, a PlayStation 4 exclusive, has been confirmed for PC, and will release as early as this year itself. As primarily PC gamers, we're ecstatic about this news, however, we also can't help but point out that this is kind of a slap in the face for those who bought the PlayStation expecting the game to remain an exclusive. It's a broken promise, if you will, and those never feel good, do they?

The fact that a PlayStation exclusive is coming to PC at all is a big deal, it would mark the first time in 25 years, since the launch of the original PlayStation, that a Sony-developed (Guerrilla Games is under Sony) and published game is making its way to PC. One could argue that Death Stranding made its way onto PC but that's still a third party developer –

Kojima Productions, even though it uses the same Decima game engine that Horizon Zero Dawn does.

Rumours suggest that The Last of Us will also be coming to PC as well, and if that is confirmed that would mean that we can possibly expect more of Sony's exclusives to, well, no longer be exclusive. This move somewhat baffles us. Exclusives have been the driving force behind the PlayStation, so it does feel like Sony is throwing that advantage away. One might argue they'll make more money this way, by opening up their games to a wider audience. But is that actually the case?

There's no argument that a good PC will run games better, they're way more powerful. A high-end PC, while expensive initially, is cheaper in the long run; cheaper upgrades, cheaper games. There's no denying that this move could discourage a lot of people from getting a PlayStation. Even if Sony were to employ a timed exclusive kind of deal, the kind that Epic has, people will be more than happy to wait a few years to play the game on PC. That's a far better option than waiting a few years for a broken emulator that might crash at any given minute.

Microsoft has come on record saying they don't really care much for the console wars anymore, it's all about the cloud and streaming in the future. To that end, we've already got xCloud and the Xbox Game Pass from their end and in Microsoft's case, it's a step in the right direction. Sony however, aren't in a position where they need to give up on their console at all, the PlayStation till very much sells well. Sure, the PlayStation is working on their own cloud streaming project, and even have PlayStation Now for that matter. So, you can still stream a lot of PlayStation games on PC via PS Now, including popular exclusives for a limited time only, however. There's still incentive to get a PlayStation in this case, but bringing the game to PC outright removes that incentive.

So, what's the deal here Sony? Are you going the Xbox way? Have you decided to venture into the PC market for good or are you just testing the waters? Are you going to delay exclusives, or limit them, or is this a one-off? We guess time will tell.
