

How is Han alive in F&F9?

Han who supposedly died in Tokyo Drift is alive in the new Fast and Furious, here's 14 ways how. <https://dgit.in/mar20-41>

No /r/nosleep for you

The mods of popular subreddit r/nosleep made the subreddit private to protest theft and lack of credit. <https://dgit.in/mar20-42> attached at the top. So, it just flapped back into position as Andy escaped.

THE MCFLY'S FAIL TO RECOGNISE THEIR CHILD

Back To The Future is often hailed as a film that tackled the perplexing concept of time travelling relatively well. The film focuses on the teenager, Marty McFly, who travels back in time and accidentally stops his parents from ever meeting. He has to quickly remedy this before he's erased from existence. He's successful but when he goes back (to the future), his parents, George and Lorraine McFly have no recollection of meeting 16-year-old Marty in 1955. The plothole while discernible has a simple explanation. Pipthepirate on Reddit opines that in the future, Marty's parents are 30 years older and how many of you will be able to remember someone's face you saw 30 years ago for a week or so? Also, the McFlys raise Marty as a child and will not possibly make the association, because of how bizarre it is. They'd see him every day, watch him grow up, his features change and simply see him as their child.

DUMB MALCOLM?

M. Night Shyamalan's masterpiece, The Sixth Sense, still holds enough power to shake first-time watchers to the core. The impactful, unforeseen ending undeniably shooketh all of us. In hindsight though, it does seem a little absurd how Malcolm (Bruce Willis) has absolutely no idea he's dead seeing that no one talks to him, and some other ghosts in the film seem like they're aware of their passing. The answer, however, is artfully written into the film's narrative. Cole explicitly explains that ghosts don't usually come to terms with their death. Some of them go as far as creating their own distorted version of reality in order to keep 'living' (in denial). So, Malcolm would rightfully have his Eureka moment when he came to terms with it, which was exactly the moment the film gives it to us and him.

BIFROST BRIDGE CONUNDRUM

In the very first Thor film, it is explicitly stated that the Asgardians use the Bifrost bridge to travel between worlds. However, Thor destroys this bridge during the conclusion of the film. Nevertheless, in the Avengers, he just appears on Earth? Fans have been baffled by the seemingly-large plothole that ultimately brings Thor back to Earth without any answers. Or, so they think... In the Avengers, Loki does state, "With the Bifrost gone, how much dark energy did the Alfather have to muster to conjure you here?" This implies that Odin mustered a ton of dark power to send Thor back to Earth, as explained by not-sterling on Reddit. In Infinity War as well, Heimdall conjures up this mystical dark energy to transport Hulk to Earth.

THE BOY WHO NEVER DIES

The Boy Who Lived seems to live through a whole lot... he wouldn't be called that if he didn't, would he? However, the books and films make one fact abundantly clear – any Horcrux will be cease to exist when destroyed by something stronger than itself (Godric Gryffindor's sword, Basilisk venom, etc). However, in Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets, Harry gets bitten by the gigantic Basilisk but still refuses to go down, ultimately having Fawkes, the phoenix, heal him? It seems a bit absurd, yes. JK Rowling herself debunked this 'plothole'. She said Horcruxes need to be destroyed beyond repair. You can see this in the Chamber of Secrets, where the diary needed to be stabbed a considerable number of times before Tom Riddle's ghostly form eventually faded away. So, by that logic, Harry would have to have been killed by the Basilisk in order for the Horcrux within him to be destroyed. Since Fawkes saved him before he could meet his maker, the Horcrux within him continued to live on.

INDIANA JONES WAS USELESS?

This is a popular one, so much so that one episode of the Big Bang Theory also explored this life-altering plothole (for staunch Indy fans, that is). Amy effectively ruins Indiana Jones and the Raiders of the Lost Ark for superfan Sheldon, much to his dismay, by pointing out that Indiana Jones "plays no role in the outcome of the story". Regardless of Indiana Jones part in the film, "the Nazis would have still found the Ark, taken it to the island, opened it and died". Several loyal Indy fans have debunked this 'plothole' in multiple ways. Firstly, the Nazis had no idea where the Ark was in the city of Tanis. Until Toht showed up with half the map burned onto his palm, that is. Why did he get those instructions? Because the Nazis were tracking Indy. Indy went on to lead the Nazis to Marion Ravenwood. Indiana Jones later goes to Cairo and gets the complete set of map instructions, but the Nazis discovered him and the Ark. Thanks to Indy's direct involvement. One argument still states that they could have found the Ark by blindly digging years, or decades down the line. Nevertheless, without Indy, the Ark would have surely just sat there in the city of Tanis. This could lead to grave consequences such as more Nazis finding it and learning how to weaponise it. So, Indy did save the world and all you fans can rest easy now. 