

Netflix vs. Hulu

Read this article to see how the two streaming giants took digs at each other on Twitter. <https://digit.in/mar20-21>

Bot climate tweets

Analysis of millions of tweets reveals that a quarter of all climate crisis related tweets are produced by bots. <https://digit.in/mar20-22>

The Trolls of Tech

Tech companies cannot resist trolling each other – whether it is over their latest products or their competitor's weakness. Here are some of the best instances of our times.

Arnab Chattopadhyay |
feedback@digit.in

T

he race to stay on top of the ever-changing world of technology can get really competitive. In some cases, it can move beyond the realm of competing with products into competing with marketing campaigns and advertisements. Brands going at each other with the best burns usually works as a great marketing tactic and tech companies are no different. The fact that the tech scene is full of great rivalries (iOS-Android, Xbox-Playstation, PC-Console, etc) only makes inter-brand trolling more appealing. Over the years, many tech brands have engaged in trolling their rivals. Here are some of the best instances.

SAMSUNG TROLLING APPLE – THE NEXT BIG THINGS/INGENIOUS

Everybody likes to take a shot at Apple – especially for the positioning that Apple takes with their devices. However, no one quite does it like Samsung when it comes to trolling Apple's iPhones whenever a Galaxy phone is launching. Even though they are business partners, Samsung routinely features iPhones in their ads – only to show them incapable of doing something that the Galaxy can achieve with ease. However, a couple of the most infamous examples of this are what we can call the 'Next Big Thing' series and the 'Ingenious' series. The Next Big Thing series was used during the launch of the Galaxy S2 and S3, and showed a long line of people in queue outside an Apple store waiting for the next iPhone to be available for purchase – only to be severely distracted or jealous of a passerby's Galaxy phone and its features. The Ingenious series features several short clips which directly show a store employee unable to resolve customer queries about why the latest iPhone is incapable of doing something that the Samsung Galaxy S9 can – delivering punchlines with the employee's dismissive and fanboyish behaviour.

APPLE TROLLING MICROSOFT – I'M A MAC

No list about rival tech ads will be complete without mentioning the 'I'm a Mac' series of ads – there's more than 60 of those! The ads show Mac as a young, casually dressed guy – popularly portrayed by Justin Long – whereas PC is portrayed as an older, more formally dressed guy played by author John Hodgman in most ads. The series started off in 2006 with the intentions of showing non-Apple users what the Mac is capable of while, at the same time, showcasing the PCs drawbacks. While they never explicitly refer to the name of any company, there's a whole lot of talk about Vista which is a clear jab at Microsoft. No matter which side of the campaign you find yourself on, the series makes for great entertainment value and can be enjoyed here: <https://digit.in/AppleTrollsMicrosoft>. The iconic campaign was also extended into intro videos for several Apple events like WWDC in the years 2006, 2007 and 2009 as well as MacWorld Expo 2008.

MICROSOFT TROLLING GOOGLE – SCROOGLED

When Microsoft had to take a shot at Google, it

A notch-family from a Samsung series of ads trolling the iPhone X