Editor's Note: This is a multi-part story experiment. We'd like to set a premise, give you reading material, and then continue the story next month, to see if it enhances the experience. We hope you will forgive us for using you as subjects of this experiment. Please read the books mentioned and come back next month for part 2 of this article.

Carl Jung was one of the most influential psychologists of the twentieth century, and was a protégé of Sigmund Freud. Together, they worked on psychoanalysis for about seven years. What a psychologist does, the typical solitaire couch and chair seen in TV Shows and Movies, is derived from the work of these two psychologists. However, Jung had his own ideas that were distinct from Freud's and he went on to start a different approach that is called analytical psychology. Jung advocated a process of individualisation, where the psychologist helps a person understand themselves better over a series of sessions, and becoming increasingly conscious of their inner, interpersonal and cultural experiences. At the same time, Jung didn't simply try to understand the subconsciousness, he wanted to explore it, and understand it better. He advocates a study of mythology as a way to do this, as the enduring nature of these ancient stories might have something to teach us about what it means to be human. He believed myth to be a road into the land of the subconsciousness. Just as the human body has organs that affect physical health, the psyche has factors called archetypes that affect psychological health. Archetypes are more than stereotypical characters, such as the old man, the hero, or the wild woman, but can be patterns, images or themes that are common in different cultures.

Jung's work bridged the philosophies of the east and the west, the old world and the new. He saw the common themes in these stories from all around the world, and concluded that their source was the knowledge and wisdom locked within a collective human unconsciousness. Freud saw the unconsciousness as a wasteland, or a dumping ground for all the primitive, animalistic or childish thoughts, a festering ground for repressed sexual urges. Jung saw the unconscious-
