will be changed forever. You will no longer picture deep desolate valleys, but lush green mountains, with meadows on the gentler slopes, forests all around, and a river lazily snaking through the middle of it all. You can also see Rosong village from a distance, which has a single ancient ropeway which is the simplest contact the village of around 300 odd people has with the external world. The Khasis live precariously on the edge here, farming on the sides of the cliffs. For most of the year, the canyons are shrouded in fog, which only adds to their ethereal beauty.

MEHRANGARH FORT

This is one of the largest and most impressive forts in India, and a single day is simply not enough to explore all parts of it. There are multiple museums, handicraft shops and period accurate eateries peppered all around the fort, and there are cultural shows in the evenings. The entire fort is a living, breathing time capsule. This is one place where you can find both cultural and military artefacts, ranging from cannons to palanquins. There are also some truly random collections that are nonetheless fascinating, including turbans and musical instruments. The armoury has the weapons and gear used through the ages by the Rathores, and has some rare items such as the swords used by Akbar and Timur. The guns have barrels inlaid with precious metals, and the swords have handles made of exquisite materials such as rhino horn and jade.

NALANDA

For five hundred years since its ascent in the 4th century, Nalanda was one of the most important centres of learning in this part of the world. Students from all across Asia came to study at the university, which actually had a tough entrance exam even in those times. Visitors can walk through the expansive ruins of the university. There is also a museum exhibiting the archaeological finds at the site.

RAMNAGAR

This is a destination for adventure tourism with a range of activities available including rock climbing, bouldering, zip lining, kayaking, and if none of these cut it then multiple picturesque camping locations. There is a pristine pond in the Ramadevara Betta Hill, and a tiny bubbling stream called Mokedatu, which literally translates to goat's crossing. There is also a museum housing folk artefacts and an amphitheatre and Janapadaloka, and the town of Channapatna from where you can get the famed colourful toys for children. The trek to SRS hills is kind of hilarious because they have actually put a shade along the entire trail for the convenience of the trekkers! Then there is Ramagiri, a hill with rock climbing activities, and which has almost officially been renamed to Sholay Hill, because this is where Gabbar's hideout was in the movie. There are so many interesting spots that you can make a weeklong vacation out of it.

RANI KI VAV

This is another stepwell, and located in the town of Patan. The site was rediscovered in the 40s and painstakingly restored by the Archaeological Survey of India, and now is a UNESCO world heritage site. The stepwell has seven layers, and has a series and levels of bridges and with incredibly intricate
