constantly making him judge the human race for their actions and for speaking up against him. Batman, on the other hand, was introduced as a vigilante, who relies on ruthless methods to strike fear. Despite being a human first, Batman chooses to hurt his own people in a lethal manner to get his point across and pass his judgement. However, people still accepted his actions. This has an effect on Batman's ego, as he starts thinking that he is above the law by assigning himself the roles of the judge, jury and executioner.

In order to incorporate the idea of mythology, Zack introduced three significant characters. Superman the God, Batman the Human and Lex Luthor the Demon. Superman was presented as someone with a higher power who desires to be as human as possible. People worshipped him. He had created his own cult. There were scenes in the movie where people would bow down to him and stretch their arms just to touch and feel a Godly figure. This implication was further fabricated into the audience's minds by the use of colours and lighting. In Superman's case, blindingly bright white and a blue coloured tint. However, all Superman wanted was to do the right thing and feel that he belonged to the human race. Batman was presented as an exact opposite of Superman. A human who was blinded by his actions and consequences leading him onto believing that he was a God. Although people did look up to him, they knew that his methods were a bit too extreme. Zack also leaves a lot up to the audience's interpretation. Most scenes involving Batman has a yellow tint to it. Our interpretation is that the colour yellow is supposed to signify the sun and that Batman was Icarus. The man who flew too close to the sun only to end up falling. This was further solidified in the scene where Batman and Superman stand face to face on the Batmobile with flames blazing with Superman saying, "Next time they shine your light in the sky, don't go to it. The Bat is Dead." Throughout the film, Batman chooses to establish his values and righteousness onto humanity. Lex Luthor acts as a man turned demon. Throughout the film, he tries to prove that Superman is a False God. Lex captures Superman's mother to prove that God indeed does take sides by getting him to fight against a human, Batman. This also highlights the mischievous aspect of a demon, where they create havoc just to entertain themselves. Although the idea of introducing mythology into filmmaking is a bit offbeat, Zack Snyder manages to pull it off convincingly.

BONG JOON-HO

When it comes to genre-bending direction, Bong Joon-ho is in a class of his own. Most of his films start pretty normally before taking a turn for the worst. Usually, the way other films do this is by setting into the horrific parts slowly and methodically. Bong on the other hand just throws it onto the audience's face, inducing a shock factor. He is known for mixing and shifting genres in a way that affects the audience's judgement and perception of his films. The most common traits of his films are the use of social themes, black comedy, slapstick humour and sudden tone shifts. He incorporates these traits into all of his films regardless of what the base idea is. Whether it is a murder mystery, a political statement or a thriller Bong Joon-ho manages to use his style of direction to differentiate himself from others and earn the title "A Genre of One".

Bong introduces political and societal norms into his movies quite subtly. He does this through his genius-level intellect in story writing and cinematography. The usual theme that he follows is the class divide in society. He showcases the difference between the rich and poor in a symbolic manner despite the base genre or material being something else. This is most apparent in his Oscar-winning film Parasite and the 2016 thriller, Snowpiercer through cinematography and basic setting. Another subtle use of this symbolism was seen in his dark comedy film, Barking Dogs Never Bite, where it was said that only the rich could afford dogs, subtly in a random casual dialogue. Other than political and social norms, Bong also manages to spark a conversation amongst individuals on the idea of veganism. In his 2017 Action/Adventure film Okja, he kept switching between wholesome moments with the super pig and scenes involving cruelty towards animals. This was done to create a bias within the audience's mind as to whether it is okay to kill a playful and loving animal, for the sole purpose of consumption. He also sparks the debate of huge companies selling meat from genetically modified animals for consumption by lying to their customers. The idea of genetic mutation or modification was also touched upon in The Host, where he tried to initiate fear with regards to dumping toxic chemicals into natural water bodies. The base genre of the above-mentioned movies is that it is a thriller, adventure or a dark comedy. However, Bong still manages to reflect his idea of the current politi-
