FEATURE

The cosplay community is a closely knit one, all drawn together by their love for portraying their favourite characters by donning their attire and look. While it started off as a hobby for many, today, it's a viable career option. Of course, there are the usual caveats and not everyone can do this for a living.

GETTING INTO COSPLAY

When it comes to cosplay, what every practising cosplayer will tell you is that it's most important to have fun. You are after all doing this because you enjoy it, right?

One of the things that makes cosplayers stand out is the making of their own costumes. Of course, if you're not the artistic type, or don't have the skill-set to make your own costumes, you don't have to worry. Even minimalist cosplays are welcome. Like we mentioned above, the cosplay community is a welcoming one.

Top-tier cosplayers will plan days, or even months, ahead for their next cosplay. These costumes are intricate and full of detail. It's all about the attention to detail, and it's immediately noticeable when effort has been put into a costume. Of course, this doesn't come cheap, and only the best of the best do this full-time and are booked for conventions all year-round.

EXPERIMENTATION

While it's nice to stay true to the original source, or inspiration for your cosplay, there's no hard and fast rule. Cosplay is just another way or form to express yourselves, being creative with your outfit is encouraged. This creativity could come in many ways, for example, it could be a modified version of a character, outfitted to look like it belongs to a different era or TV series. Like giving a character a sci-fi or steampunk twist for example. Another creative method some cosplayers have used is with gender-bend cosplays, cosplaying as male versions of female characters or vice versa. There's also crossplay, where male cosplayers dress up as female characters and vice versa.

IT COMES WITH ITS OWN RISKS

Much like a career in gaming, a career in cosplay is still something that's very niche and not generally understood by the masses. It's hard to find parents who would fully support someone pursuing a career in this field, understandably so, but things may change in the future if cosplay becomes more mainstream and accessible to the masses. Ultimately, for the majority, this is still just a hobby, which can be pretty expensive as well.

Another downside of cosplay, something that especially female cosplayers face, is harassment. Many have complained of being harassed at conventions, while the majority are women, men have also come forward. Conventions have taken measures to bring awareness to this issue, be it via large signs or on-ground staff keeping an eye on things. Cosplay is something that anyone should be able to practice, regardless of costume or outfit, without worrying about harassment.

While the cosplay community is welcoming and close-knit, the convention-going crowd can be pretty harsh when it comes to accuracy of outfits and whether or not your body looks the part. Body-shaming is also unfortunately something that comes with the hobby. The best thing to do here is not let the few negatives cloud what could be an overall positive experience.

Overall, cosplay has come a long way. What started as a hobby is now a career option for many individuals, and a passion that many have, creating a subculture of its own. Today, one could even say that cosplay is an artform, considering the work and effort that goes into creating a costume, to bring a character from the world of fiction, to real life.
